SEAMEN DISCHARGED ABROAD. .Consul Merlin, in his report on the trade of continental Greece during the years 1875 and 1876, speaking of scamen discharged abroad, beerves that it may be laid down as a general rale that one sailing vessel gives more trouble to her Majesty's Consular Officers shroad than 20 steamers. The latter reninn only a short time in port, and the row, which generally consists of a better class of seamen than those in miling messels, is actively employed during that period in discharging and taking in cargo, while a sailing vessel, and especially a collier, may stop 15 to 20 days in harbour and liberty being given to the men on Sundays, an appearance either by master or crew is pretty fure to take place at the Consular-Office on the following Monday. So far as Consul Merlin's Service proves, 99 out of every 100 cases of insubordination on board vessels in the Reitish. Merchant Service sproad may be traced to the effects of liquor obtained other by the sallors. on shore, or conveyed to them by stealth as, if Hongroud, London San Francisco, and they have no money, they will too often barter their clothes to obtain drink. On the whole, Consul Merln is inclined to believe that the character of British sailors even in the worst class of vessels has improved of late years, which is no doubt owing to the establishment of Sailors' Homes, savings banks, and other institutions of a similar nature. But then, again, the crows of our merchant ships are no longer exclusively proportion to the premium paid by them.
